Through the American Democracy Game, you can put yourself in the shoes of a lawmaker and find out what it is like to deal with public policy issues. Discover the different interests on each side of an issue and how negotiation and compromise can lead to a good result. This new online game, developed by National Council of State Legislatures' Trust for Representative Democracy, is designed for middle school students and includes teacher guides and information. Older students and adults can benefit from and enjoy this game, as well.

Users take the role of an elected official, receiving their own office and staff. They must listen closely to their constituents, learn the particulars about each issue, and compromise with fellow legislators. There are three levels of adventure; each covers a different issue and concentrates on different elements of the democratic process. Eventually, each issue comes to a vote and users see an outcome based on their decisions.
