BODY SAFETY

Child Sexual Abuse Prevention Program

By: TERRY HALL

During the Body Safety presentation, children repeat that their body parts belong to them. Even though they are children, they have the right to say “NO” to any inappropriate touch to the private parts.

The Body Safety program is not designed to instill fear into the children, but to empower them to protect themselves, boost their self-esteem, and to tell when there has been an incident of sexual abuse. We do not want children worrying about whom to watch out for, but to empower them to watch their own bodies.

The program, at all age levels, tastefully and respectfully teaches the proper names of the private parts. The purpose is to circumvent the major reason that children do not tell when they are abused: embarrassment. As adults, when we give children “game names” for their private parts, we might be sending a message that we do not want to talk about the private parts, even when there is a perfectly good reason. Often times a perpetrator has used a game to abuse a child and in the process of doing so, uses various, and at times bizarre names for the private parts. There have been occasions when a child has told and was not understood because the adult was not in tune with the terms the child was using. The usage of proper body part names sets this program apart from other safety programs. Both parents and staff are now realizing the importance of a clear message. For some children a friendly hug received at school may be the only hug they get and this should not be discouraged. Properly naming the body parts helps to limit the chance for confusion.

Second through fifth grade students are given a more in-depth presentation of the principles of the Body Safety program coupled with a higher degree of question and answers about child sexual abuse. Key issues of embarrassment, guilt, fear, and shame are more strongly approached. Some of the common myths of child sexual abuse, such as the ratio of boy victims to girl victims, are explained. Older children often will tell someone other than their parents if they are abused. The program stresses that if they cannot bring themselves to tell their parents, they need to find someone that can help and tell them. What to do if your best friend confides in you about an abuse situation is also explained. A best friend does not sit back and watch someone they care about go through something so terrible alone.

It is important to re-emphasize that this is a program to empower children and not to frighten them. The program’s track record demonstrates the success of its methods, but it is not a miracle cure for child sexual abuse. Parents and teachers must role-play with the students to refresh and remind them of the principles of the program. The program cannot and will not work by itself. No one can watch over our children every moment of every day and that is the primary reason for the development of the “BODY SAFETY” Program. Ignoring the problem of child sexual abuse will not stop abuse from occurring. Many perpetrators look for communities and opportunities where the topic is not being discussed and children are not being educated on how to protect themselves.
